Not illustrated. 1745 edition. Excerpt: ... for a long time, unless it be approved by experiment; and Julius Gracianus says, that, where many advantages of the country shall invite us to plant a noble vine, we will inquire and look out for one that is generous. Where there is nothing at all, or not much, that may encourage and allure us, we will rather pursue and search after fruitful ones, which, in the same proportion, is not so much excelled by the price, as it does excel by its abundance. But, concerning this opinion, though I myself, a little before, was of the same mind, nevertheless what my secret judgment is, upon closer consideration, I (shall presently tell in its proper place; for I am resolved to teach after what manner vineyards may be constituted equally fruitful, and productive also at the same time of a precious liquor. Chapter, near, 'That there is nothing of greater Advantage, and more expedients for Husbandmen than to cultivate Vineyards. NOW, before I come to discourse of the planting of vines, I don't think it improper to lay, as a certain foundation for our future dispute, that we have before thoroughly weighed, and wisely considered, whether the culture of vineyards will enrich a master of a family; for it is almost to no purpose to give directions about planting them, while that which is the chief point, and first to be considered, is not yet granted; viz. whether or not we ought to have any vines at all? And this very many people are in so great doubt of, that many avoid it, and are much afraid of employing their land in this manner, and think, that an estate in meadows, pasture, or coppes, is more to be desired and wished for; for, as to lands planted with trees for supporting vines, there has been also no small dispute among authors,...
