GUIDE TO THE RIVER AND THE SOURCE BY MARGARET A. OGOLA: Comprehensive Analysis, Questions with Answers EDWIN SIMIYU

The protagonist, Akoko, is the daughter to chief (Chief Odera) of Yimbo, and is so loved by one of her suitors (Chief Owuor Kembo) of Sakwa that he agrees to pay thirty head of cattle as her bride price without demure, a staggering sum at the time. She is happily married, and has children (Obura, Nyabera, and Owang'Sino), described rather sweetly as being "clothed in nothing but the love of Were, god of the rising sun, and a string of beads." When her husband dies, however, his family tries to steal her wealth. She has never seen a white person, but has heard rumors of a new government in Kisumu, so she walks five days in company of Odongo and Opiyo, further than anyone in her community has ever gone, to plead for the massive help that could help her get justice since the society she lives in is patriarchal. The District Commissioner investigates, and her wealth is returned. She has, however, to leave her husband's village. Her daughter Nyabera, now an adult, is also widowed, and also persecuted by her husband's family. She has heard of a new religion, the god of which particularly loves widows and orphans. She travels to the Catholic mission, and is absorbed by that faith. Her mother Akoko, and only surviving child, Awiti, join her there. Awiti is very intelligent, and is one of only two girls to be awarded scholarships to a teaching college. She marries well, and has seven children, whose lives in twentieth century Kenya span every profession from air-hostessing (Becky) to hematology, and electronics (Vera) and Wandia Mugo who gets a scholarship.
