A murder/suicide in Alaska's high Arctic looks suspicious. Two bodies are found in Canada's Oil Sands. A detective in Alaska and one in Canada find the victims worked for the same company that manages water systems for oil companies.

When the detective in Canada discovers the head of the water systems company is a retired Professor with a grudge against big oil, she tries to convince her superiors that this could be the start of an attack on North America's Oil fields.

Both detectives now race against time as the bodies pile up. Someone else is involved in this plot to destroy oil production and until they know all the players, the detectives are always to late in their investigation to stop more deaths.

This is the first in the Detective Bernadette Callahan series. This novel, and the one preceding, PipeLine Killers, surf the very edges of what is possible in present oil technology, and how someone could penetrate and destroy production.

If you enjoy fast-paced action with a tinge of black humour, you will enjoy this novel and the following, PipeLine Killers.
